There has been foot very broad. The approach on either side specting the Hanoverian succession. The government were apparently equally satisfied of this and the question of Brunswick succession was apparently on the eve of being satisfactorily settled when the crown prince wrote a letter to the chancellor objecting to his brother-in-law being permitted to ascend the throne of Brunswick till he had clearly renounced his claim to the throne of Hanover.

The step taken by the crown prince is undoubtedly on this occasion popular but in government circles his interference in so delicate a question in such a pub-lic manner is distinctly deprecated.

EDUCATION ONE OF HONGKONG'S

to Play Tremendous Part in Spreading Western Knowledge and Ideals Through Republic

GOVERNMENT ACTIVE

(Special to the Monitor)

HONGKONG-From almost every point of view the Crown colony of Hongkong presents to the student of colonial history examples of advancement and progress, though on account of the rapidity of the colony's rise to the position of a great commercial center some of its developments in domains other than that of commerce, equally remarkable and perhaps even more farreaching in their effects, are apt to be overshadowed, or lost sight of.

One of Hongkong's most striking achievements has been in the matter of education. Government and private schools and colleges have for many years been doing a great work among the Chinese, and this activity has re-cently been crowned by the opening of the Hongkong University, which ranks as the foremost educational establishment in the far east, and promises to play a tremendous part in the spreading of western ideals and knowledge through the new republic.

Great as have been the colony's educational triumphs much still remains to be accomplished. So far the provision and supervision of schools by the government has practically been confined to the city of Victoria and the island of Hongkong, the larger portion of the area under British rule, comprising the leased and ceded territory on the mainland and many islands, having remained almost untouched in this respect.

The opening of the Canton-Kowloon railway, with the facilities it afforded the Chinese in this district of coming more frequently and directly into contact with westerners and western meth ods, wrought great changes but for the most part the people are still content with their conservative methods, and in the villages away from the railway line, reached in many instances by devious mountain paths, one may still see the Chinese living in the primitive style of their forefathers.

A report upon an inspection of the Chinese schools in this district, made by officials of the education department Parliamentary Secretary of Board as a preliminary to the enforcement of a new education ordinance recently passed by the legislative council, which places these scholastic establishments directly under government supervision, throws some interesting light upon the primitive methods of teaching in vogue, and forms a striking vindication of the M. P., parliamentary secretary to the a section of the Chinese in the districts principally affected. In many of the schools the inspectors found that methods which were old a century ago were still being followed. Some of the Chinese day schools visited were run by mere boys who had apparently been forced by poverty to curtail their own education and were seeking to turn their two or three years' schooling to account. In many cases the master had not the remotest idea of teaching, and in one or two instances spoke had pidgin English. School class rooms lighted by guttering oil lamps and used as living and sleeping apartments by out as sleeping quarters to coolies, whose bunks occupied two or three sides of the room. It is not surprising that the work done under such conditions and amid such surroundings was, in the majority of cases, very poor, and the waste of time enormous. Many of the children examined were under the impression that Hongkong was Chinese territory, and apparently no attempt had been made to enlighten them.

Now all this is to be changed. The government supervision to which the chools will be subjected will doubtless have a very marked effect, which will in time be reflected on the life and thought of the villages, and government bad housing from which the nation sufschools which will be opened in a few fered so much. In these words Capt. James Craig summed up the present position of Ulster Unionists, in conful seat, Craigavon, outside Belfast.

The Monitor representative had pointed out to Captain Craig several statements which had been made in regard to the attitude of the Ulster Unionists, and before answering them in detail Captain Craig summed up the position

For some time past it had been stated in various responsible quarters that the Ulster volunteers were not only paid for parading, as they had a few days before at Balmoral, but had been paid for every hour they had spent in

"Well," Captain Craig said, when his attention was drawn to this statement, it can only be described as stupid. It is one of those statements which, to any one who knows the position, is preposterous. In the first place, if you take the Ulster volunteer force at the very moderate estimate of 50,000 men, and emember that each one of these men, at least six hours a week, you will see the enormous amount of money which it would have required to pay them even small return for their time.

"In so far, however, as a positive contradiction is of any avail, you may take it from me that not one of these 50,000 men has ever received a single farthing for the time he has given to this work. Not only this, but every one of them has spent money on their equipment. the construction and the upkeep of their drill halls, and if you were to examine the contribution lists of any of these halls you would see what an enormous amount was contributed by the men themselves."

Bentley W. The Bay State Street Railway Com pany was represented by James F. Jackson, who opposed the order because he considered it unnecessary. "Public service corporations are not supposed to spend time and money in piling up volumes of useless statistics," he said. He considered that the statements, if required at all, should not be submitted oftener than quarterly.

HOW TO FIGURE ON INCOME FROM BOND INVESTMENTS THE SOUTHERN

Many Investors Have Difficulty in Reaching Correct Results With Regard to Securities—Having Fixed Maturities as Element of Time Is a Factor

yield and why?" He says:

or a banker consult a basis book, or table of bond values, so that they might ascertain the exact income return of a given bond at a given price. While the figures given in these tables of bond values are having a fixed maturity, another element enters into the computation which makes attached and is equal to par when the If the company should lose the suit in it somewhat confusing. In bonds, as stocks, the return is figured on the cost. In the former, however, we have the element of time entering in as an additional

While the mathematical processes on which bond value tables are based are not complex, and can be worked out by any one who understands algebra, the formulae involve some rather awkward figures and the use of logarithms, and solution takes a good deal of time. no one thinks of stopping to figure out the return of the general run of bonds, preferring to rely implicitly on the published bond value tables. The use of bond value tables requires nothing but simple arithmetic, and a thorough understanding of them is well worth while, as it enables a bond buyer to prac-tise correct investment accountancy. Bonds are issued generally in $1000 de-nominations, but frequently in $100 and $500, and sometimes in odd amounts.

The prices however are always quoted on the percentage of par value, and for the purposes of illustration we shall take a $100 bond.

Referring to the basis book, we find that a bond running 20 years and bearing 5 per cent interest, will yield 4 per cent return when bought at a price of $113.68; and that if the same bond were bought at $88.44, the yield would be 6 per cent. In the former case, we have to consider that in 20 years the bond for which we paid $113.68 will mature and be retired at $100. Here is an apparent loss of $13.68. On this investment of $113.68, we have received $2.50 every six months, this being the amount on the semi-annual 5 per cent received, a sum, which if put at comat 4 per cent) will, with other like sums sited every six months, amount harge off the amortization every six on our books at $100,000. onths instead of carrying it in a fund.

According to the basis book, the same-end for which we paid $113.68, when it 20 years to run, will be worth, when t has 1914 years to run; $113:45. The ifference between these two sums is 23 cents, or the correct amortization for vertible 6 per cent debentures sold in tral eventually would have little apprethat six months' period. In the case where we buy the 5 per cent 20-year bond at $88.44, we are buying it at a discount, and while we do not receive any greater annual income than $5, we do at maturity receive $11.56 more than we invested, and this amount, correctly distributed over the intervening of 800 tons. per cent on its cost.

may not be interesting to all investors, its application is valuable in the accounting of an investment fund. It has been in the past, and is to a certain extent today, the practise among a great many institutions to charge off the entire premium they paid in purchasing bonds to their profit and loss account and then consider the entire proceeds of coupons received, as income. A more scientific method and a method that is being more generally adopted, is to amortize the premium and discounts.

Returning to the original illustration of a 20-year 5 per cent bond selling on a 4 per cent basis, the cost of $100,000 coupon. As the principal investment was $13.68 more than will be received at maturity it is obvious that this loss in maturity it is obvious that this loss in the coupon. As the principal investment was bonds on that basis would be $113,680, or a premium of $13,680. ## Agriculture a Dignified Occupation

That agriculture is the most dignified and useful form of manual work is the idea of many great thinkers and we know how Hawthorne strove to strike a balance between his literary work and the labors at Brook Farm, where he worked, it was said, "like a giant," He at last gave it up, feeling evidently that his service of letters forbade him to spend so many hours a day in farm work. The other members of Brook Farm had this same idea-that if all would raise food for themselves directly from the earth it would simplify human affairs. In the end they all seem to have discovered that it is better to let the people with a special training for farm work do that and leave the others free to do what they are best fitted to do.

This idea of special training for farm work is gaining more and more influence in the present time; but it is probably true that the failure of the Brook Farm experiment helped it, if only in an indirect way. It helped at least to demand for farming its rightful place of importance and respect, a place it had held so long in American society but which it lost for a while under the first developments of mechanical industries that seemed to bring in more money. The agriculturist is learning now to use the very things that the mechanical industries have made for him. This lifts farming to greater efficiency and to a better financial basis. If the Brook Farm people had had modern farm machinery their project might have suc-

One of the most impressive among my early recollections is that of having gazed upon Daniel Webster, writes Henry Clay Barnabee in the National Magazine, Hesays: "I can see him now as he looked that day in Portsmouth more than three. that day in Portsmouth more than three score and ten years ago—his massive frame and magnificent head surmounted by a broad-brimmed stove pipe hat—bis dark, deep-set, cavernous eyes, smouldering beneath their overhanging brows illustration of the capacity which we all is a sort cultivated in gardens called the which reminded me of the coping of a cathedral-his firm set lips and determined chin. He wore a high black stock and collar, a blue coat with brass but tons, a buff waistcoat, and loosely hanging trousers. A veritable king among men, was our eloquent expounder of the constitution."

city, at Pawnee, an interesting camp meeting was held this summer. It was held in tents and booths and with a big pavilion, just like the old-fashioned camp meetings that almost all grown people remember to have seen; but the interesting thing about this one was that most of the people who came to it were Indians. The people from the churches of the white men went to help the services along, but the Indians sang in their own language, and they entertained the white people as their guests. There was a big fair pavilion fitted up for the meetings with seats and a platform and organ. The Indian tents were near, all with beds and tables and bright clean dishes, not at all like the old-time tepee where the Indians sat on the ground and ate with their fingers. The white people were entertained at the church and the minister's house. Some rooms in the church were fitted up for them. The American flag floated from the pavilion, and the Indians went in their wagons to Pawnee, when the trains came in, to drive the visitors to the camp.

Beefa ProblemforAmericans

IN QUARTERS where the meat supply has been studied with regard only to the unsentimental facts, little surprise, if any, will be occasioned by the failure of the popularly hoped-for relief, through importations, to impress experts in the agricultural department at Washington. As shown by investigation, there is no point outside of its own borders to which the United States may look with any assurance for permanent shipments of beef.

Too much has been made in this country of the ability of Canada and Argentina to meet its needs in this particular. In Canada there is already alarm with regard to the continuance of the home supply, and no effort is made to conceal the belief that exports to the United States will cause a shortage resulting in the bringing of meat prices in the Dominion up to the American level. Argentina, it is generally conceded, cannot do much more than meet the drafts of Europe upon its pastures. It may, of course, send occasional cargoes of beef to the United States, but occasional cargoes can only have a local and temporary effect in a nation of 100,000,000 people.

Mexico should not be expected to do as well in the matter of cattle-raising in the near future as it has in the past. For obvious reasons the imports from that republic to the United States are more likely to fall off than to increase. New Zealand raises mutton, not beef. It is quite possible that by picking up cattle here and there throughout the world, the United States might be able in the course of a year to add considerably to its supply, but this, to use a familiar phrase, would be, with reference to beef, simply living from hand to mouth. All thought of placing dependence on such an uncertain method of stocking the home meat market should be discouraged and abandoned as unworthy of a resourceful people.

The problem is one that must be solved in America by Americans. Not only can enough beef be raised within these borders to meet the home demand, but if the farmers of the country, without regard to geographical divisions, will only make cattle raising a part of their business, there should be a surplus annually of sufficient size to enable the United States to resume its old position as a beefexporting nation. The states and the national government may aid immensely in promoting cattle raising on the farms, East and West, North and South, by providing convenient abattoirs. This would mean the establishment of convenient markets, the elimination of long hauls for cattle and meat, and the result could not fail to be beneficial as well to the producer as to the consumer. It is absurd for the United States to look with anxious eyes elsewhere for its foodstuffs. It should be helping the rest of the world in production, rather than assisting in the drain and in the making of high prices.

The first lockage at the Pacific end of the Panama canal was made "without a hitch" on Tuesday. Colonel Goethals and his engineering staff have been very careful from the beginning in the matter of eliminating hitches, and the success they have attained in this particular should be helpful to those who shall engage in constructive work everywhere hereafter.

School Athletics in Official Care. New Bedford is an instance of the city that has arrived at full recognition of the sports of the high school as a part of the program, not to say the curriculum. So true is it that this substantial city is only an instance that there is hardly cause for special comment in the fact that the school authorities have taken over the naming of the captains of the various teams. To make that event of significance, the comparison must be made with the practise of a few years ago. What school committee of the year 1900 (and there is no need of going farther back) would have thought it was concerned in the captaincy of the football or baseball team or would have justified the faculty in devoting its time and thought in any part to the training and managing of the boys in competitive sports? What one of these boards would now consider itself warranted in trying to divorce the school and its sports?

Among the special fortunes of the opening school year, this city is counting the addition to the high school faculty of two members who are described as having "already taken an active interest in athletics," and they are assigned to the coaching of the first and second teams, in addition to instructing in physics and mathematics. This, again, is ordinary, as schools are now conducted, but extraordinary according to the standards of a decade ago. The faculty coach has been establishing himself everywhere as a highly useful person, with an influence for good conduct of the sports that is easy because of his close companionship with the players and his carrying out of the school building some of the authority he exercises inside. School spirit gains in the right direction through his presence.

It is so recently that the intrusion of the sports was much debated and violently opposed, and all manner of injury to the school was predicted for the development of organized athletics, that conclusions may not wisely be reached from experience; but it would be interesting to know if there is any town, large or small, where the inclusion of the sports under the care of the schoolmasters and the granting to them of a sort of certification as a part of the institution, has actually worked out any other than good results. The surface testimony is that the schools have gained by the process, gained in strictly educational ways and in the better discipline which springs from a newly developed loyalty. The good athlete and the good pupil are not the two and necessarily different persons it was not so long ago supposed they would have to be.

With the completion of the Panama canal San Francisco will be 8000 miles nearer New York by water than it is now, but, strange to say, the distance from New York to the Philippines will not be materially reduced and this fact will strike many as being all the more peculiar because the Atlantic ports of the United States will be brought about 4000 miles nearer Australia by the new waterway.

IF PRESIDENT WILSON, as reported, has decided to continue utilizing expert administrative aid while the Panama canal is being made ready for general use and while the zone is being fitted to be the transient home of tourists and the permanent abode of traders and a small army of soldiers sent thither for purposes of defense, he has done a natural and sensible thing. Men whose honor and competency have been tested in one task are more likely to do well in mastering the job than would any persons sent down from the states because of some mere partizan political considerations. The wonder is that at this stage of civilization it should cause any comment that the President has so decided. Both sense and sentiment conspire to make it the only natural thing to do.

Of course places for all members of the staff can hardly be found. Afready many members have returned to the states and are finding openings where experience gained in the Canal Zone counts. To have shared in the great enterprise in any honorable way is to have acquired capital of a moral kind that can be converted into money. But dispersion of the men who have worked together as associates, and who know each other's capacities, seems unfortunate. Were the policy of government development of Alaska definitely established as the law of the land, and were the details of that enterprise worked out, it would be possible for the nation to use at once both men and machinery that have served efficiently in making the Panama link between the oceans. Equally valuable employment might be found for this great force in the interstate work of conserving the flood waters of the Mississippi river valley.

The history of the assembling of the Panama staff is now a matter of record. Its subsequent utilization by the national government and by large private engineering enterprises may be an equally interesting narrative for some one to write some day.

Count

The average reader does not need to be told that it is an extremely difficult matter to move the transportation lines of the country to the acceptance or adoption of costly innovations, no matter what their promise. Presidents and boards of directors, having the good will and interests of the stockholders inview, are disposed to withhold improvements of a character likely to interfere with the semi-annual or annual dividends. The managements cannot be fairly criticized for their loyalty to trust, or for a strong leaning toward conservatism. But there is always the public interest to be considered.

Perhaps the public interest will continue to hold a place secondary to private interest in corporation management until such time as it shall be demonstrated to the shareholders, as well as to the boards of directors and presidents, that in the long run private and public interests are identical and inseparable. Such instances as the Monitor reports from Memphis need only to become more numerous in order to bring this lesson within reach. Here it is being established by a public official, the city smoke inspector, that the adoption of certain improvements in the method of fuel consumption will save the Memphis street railway something like $40,000 a year in the operation of its power station.

Another instance reported by the Monitor is along similar lines. At Council Bluffs it is shown that, as a result of the recent introduction of an electric generating plant, a turntable, the operation of which formerly called for the services of twelve men, can now be easily operated by one. No appeals to capital could be more eloquent or more effective than these. So far such instances are not numerous enough to affect the general situation; but they are likely to become so, and when there is no longer any question as to the profitable result of radical departures from present methods of obtaining and applying power, the transportation companies, great and small, will probably rather court than shun the scrap-heap.

In any event, there will be all sorts of talk regarding the "influences" behind any currency bill that may become a law. But one way of determining pretty clearly whether some of this talk is or is not justifiable will be to watch the quotations for New York stock exchange seats.

Members of Congress find some consolation in the fact, at all events, that the extra session must eventually give way to the regular session.

Wall

Paper

and the

Fashions

In a country as large and as rich as the United States there are of course many thousands of people who do not have to trouble themselves very much with regard to the high cost of anything. It is estimated that more than 400,000 persons will pay an income tax, although it is thought that the bulk of the millions of revenue to be raised in order to meet the falling off in duties will be drawn from the incomes of less than half this number. Suppose that even 100,000 persons may be found in the country whose incomes run into the hundreds of thousands; multiplying this number by five in order to include their families, this being the usual method of computation, it is found that 500,000 persons in the United States will not notice it much when the fashion of matching the wall papers and general interior decorations of the home to the costumes of the female members of the family comes into general vogue.

The idea, as we gather it somewhat hastily, is that when a woman of the ultra-fashionable set and, of course, of the class that will not mind the cost, orders a costume at her dressmaker's hereafter, she will immediately visit an interior decorator and give him an order to match the wall coverings of her home to her new gown. Perhaps—as to this our information seems vague—she will only order decorations for a room at a time, that is, she will only match one costume with one room, but in such an event, it would seem, she can only use one room while in one costume, having either to change her gown or the room decorations when she goes to another room.

Considering the means that must be at hand before this fashion can be followed at all, it will be no extravagance, in the ordinary sense, if a woman shall have a change of costume for every room in her home, or a change of room decorations for every costume.

The expense is not the question here. What will puzzle the ordinary and unfashionable person is how the ultra-fashionable, with the means at her command, is to find compensation for the time and trouble of indulgence in this fashion. There is the possibility, of course, that the new fashion may lead to the building of homes with fewer rooms, or to a general retreat to hotel suites, but it is not likely that this means of evasion of a social duty will be largely resorted to. There is a problem here, and it remains for either the costumer or the decorator, or both, to solve it.

The action of the United States House of Representatives in concurring in the Senate amendment to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill providing for the removal of deputy internal revenue collectors and deputy marshals from civil service regulations, marks a step backward. Numerous Democrats in and out of Congress recognize this fact, and are fearful of the result, both as it shall affect the public service and their party.

Bequest of his collection of works of art to the Metropolitan museum by Benjamin Altman, the merchant, was expected by those who knew of his patriotism and habitual generosity. During his rise from poverty to the rank of a multi-millionaire, he had not lost that idealism characteristic of his race. Excessively secluded from the world in his mode of living and in his pursuit of works of art, he went about amassing a collection which is extraordinarily high in quality and is worth to the metropolitan art center more than can be stated in terms of money. So measured, it is rated as worth not less than $15,000,000. As Mr. Altman also made provision in his will for an endowment fund which will meet the annual charges involved in caring for the collection, the museum's trustees will be the readier to accept the gift with such conditions of display as the donor imposed.

To the art world, the opening to daily inspection by artists and by students of treasures previously hoarded for appreciation by the few is the most important aspect of this memorable bequest. To the social philosopher, bent on analysis of contemporary American life, its more important phase is the proof it gives of the wise use that merchant princes so often make of wealth derived from skill in trading and in organizing retail business. It is not a habit peculiar to the successful business man of America. British and Canadian multi-millionaires, to go no farther afield for illustration, also have demonstrated that commercialism and art can cooperate for civic uplift through collection of works of art and donation of the same to nation or to city. The distinction of the United States is the fixity of the habit and the number of persons who practise it. Many collectors bring together splendid proofs of their taste and of their discrimination as buyers, and collect for the joy of collecting. But their aim also is largely speculative. The heirs to the estate are supposed to profit by the sale of the collection. Not so with men of the type of Bartlett in Boston, and Morgan and Altman in New York. They acquired with a civic good in view.

In a serious fashion, reputable and well-known residents of New York are to discuss, under the auspices of a Brooklyn educational institution, the question, What Is Presentable on the Stage? The immediate occasion for this ethical solicitude it is not difficult to conjecture. The wonder is that more centers of light and leading are not including the same topic on their programs for the season. The implication of the question is that there is a limit beyond which society, in justice to itself, cannot allow the craving for money or the creed of "art for art's sake" to go. The very assumption is bracing in view of much current moral flaccidity. But the singular fact in connection with conditions of present-day drama is that the acuteness of the problem of social censorship, on which this Brooklyn debate will shed light, is due not so much to greedy managers or to foolish esthetes as to social reformers. The demand for extreme realism now comes from the quarter where opposition is most intense against all compromise with impurity. This fact divides ranks that hitherto have been united, and it is forcing upon playwright, player and playgoer some very concrete problems of personal ethics.

Shutting
Out
Objectionable Plays

One fact emerges from the strife that is carried on today with more heat than light, namely that American communities are to be forced to stricter censorship of plays than in the past. Such assertion of community authority should have back of it something more than intense emotion or a desire to exercise power for power's sake. Ordinary police authorities are hardly the persons to decide. Nor are recruits drawn from the ranks of professional dramatic critics or successful playwrights of the best type. A censor or a board of censors must have a combination of qualities that will enable him or them to safeguard both morals and art, but especially the former; and he or they must know that the most corrupting play often has a gloss of charm and a perfection of art.

In a quiet way the American Drama League, through its bulletins, is doing an educational work that will aid playgoers in deciding what plays they should and should not see. But the demand now is for something that gets nearer the root of the matter and that will shut off the objectionable play before it is produced and before money has been sunk in its staging and production.

It is now estimated that claims of outside investors against the Mexican government, growing out of disturbances in the country since the overthrow of President Diaz, will foot up $250,000,000. If there were any way in which this could be properly impressed upon the people of Mexico the disturbances might be brought to a close.

INVENTION of artificial lumber is again announced. There have been numerous experiments along this line but the product has been employed mainly in the construction of political party platforms.

THERE is complaint in Missouri journalistic circles that the editor nowadays is forgotten in the distribution of wedding cake. But it may be the other way. Perhaps he is more kindly remembered.

Whatever the cause of the law's delay, the agitation for more expeditious work in the courts goes on with accumulating force.
